The Secret Life of Words

A Cozy Tour of the Curiosities of the English Language

English is a living, breathing thing. Let's explore its quirks.

From the longest words you can imagine to the simple rules that trip us up, the English language is full of surprises. This isn't a grammar test; it's an invitation to get curious.

What's in a Word? Sometimes, a lot!

(A fictitious word for a lung disease, found in the Oxford English Dictionary)

The word 'fuck' originally meant 'to strike or penetrate' and appeared in a 1598 dictionary.

The word 'bookkeeper' is a rare example of three consecutive sets of double letters.

Painting with Words

Simile

An explicit comparison using "like" or "as".

When is a mother a Mother?

Capitalize when it's used as a name.
For example: "Hello, Mother." (You are using it in place of her actual name).

Don't capitalize when it's a general noun. For example: "We honour all mothers in May."

The Humble Article with Mighty Rules

Specific vs. General

a glass of juice
(any glass)

the glass of juice
(a specific one)

I'd like a glass of juice (any glass) vs. I put the glass of juice on the counter (a specific one).

Unique Nouns

We use "the" for unique things:
'The Sky', 'The Moon', 'The Taj Mahal'.

A Common Exception

in space

in the space
(for a specific gap)

We say "in space" (for outer space)
but "in the space" (for a specific gap).

Sometimes, Breaking the Rules is a Good Thing.

Can You Find the Superfluous Word?

Some common expressions use redundant words. Can you spot them?

He asked me to return it ~~back~~ within a week.

The word 'back' is redundant because 'return' already means to give back.

Throughout the ~~whole~~ year there was not a single day of peace.

The word 'whole' is redundant because 'throughout' already implies the entire period.

Language is an endless adventure.

The more we explore, the more we find.

Keep reading, keep writing, and most importantly, keep being curious.

The best parts of the story are the ones you discover yourself.
